Originally the wing on the left was one-story and there was no bay window. Hiram Whitmarsh remodeled it in 1889-1890 but died before it was finished. Note the extension of the porch which was used to ease the process of boarding or alighting from a wagon. Both Frank Whitmarsh and Ernest Young have remodeled the barn.

Below is a more recent view. The dairy barn previous to this came toward the house a little farther and they went up into the hay loft from the end rather than the side. It burned in the early 1900's from a lantern being tipped over in the hay mow. The carpenter contracted to build this barn for $1000. They got to the point of having half the rafters up. That night a bad windstorm came up and knocked the rafters all down. The builder charged an extra hundred to put them back.

Spicer's Falls, Cossitt's Glen, Bennett's Falls are all names for the falls on Trout Brook which powered Griswold's pioneer sawmill. At one time there was a sawmill at the top and a gristmill at the bottom of the falls. Later the upper mill was relocated at the foot behind the other mill nearer the falls. This sawmill continued on waterpower until it came into disuse and fell down. Walter Bennett used motor power in the gristmill which, also, contained a planing mill and a cider mill. This mill burned in 1950.

The quantity of water was certainly greater than today. Sides of the dam are to be seen in each of these views.

There was a dam in the stream at the top of the falls and water diverted to this pond. The water, then, could be allowed to flow as needed to run the mills. It is still possible to see where this pond was and parts of the course of the race-way.

An aerial photograph of a rural landscape. In the upper left, there is a large rectangular field with a light-colored horizontal stripe. A road or path runs diagonally from the top left towards the center. Two red ovals are drawn on the image: one in the center-right area and another in the lower-left area. The text 'Hurlbert Farm' is written in red above the first oval, and 'Cossitt Mill' is written in red below the second oval. The landscape is a mix of dark, wooded areas and lighter, open fields.

The home of Richard Eldridge stands on the site of the other earliest pioneer in Cuyler, Nathaniel Potter. Tragedy was his lot. First his 3-year old boy and baby girl were left motherless when his wife, Suzannah, became the first death in Cuyler. Three years later he was crushed to death by a tree he was felling and died before help could arrive. His daughter, Penelope married a Mr. Patrick and the farm stayed in the Patrick family for many years.

The last milk station in Cuyler was located here near the hotel. The Standard Dairy Company owned it in 1906 when George Soules, Madeline Wood's father, came to Cuyler to be its manager. She believed they were the first family to live over the station. All the rooms were finished in wainscoting, walls and ceiling. By pasting cheesecloth over it they were able to paper.

The woman shaking the rug is Madeline's mother. This was the back door. Note the kerosene can on the railing and the colt tied by its mother.

In 1916 or 1917 Dairymen's League bought it.

Other names connected with the milk station are Sherman House, Bob Lauber, Fred Garrison and in the thirties Mr. Handy. Earl Jones worked there at one time.

It was torn down in 1937 or 1938.

An aerial photograph of a rural landscape. The image shows a mix of agricultural fields, some of which are dark and appear to be forested or heavily wooded. A prominent feature is a large, irregularly shaped area outlined in red, which is labeled "pasture area". This area is situated in the center-right of the image. To the left of the pasture area, there is a large, dark, irregularly shaped area that appears to be a forest or a large body of water. The overall landscape is a patchwork of different land uses, with various shades of gray and black representing different vegetation and land types. The text "pasture area" is written in a bold, red, sans-serif font and is positioned within the red-outlined area.
